Is there a long term strategy in human rights technology?

by beatrice on November 1, 2017 - 10:00am

Over the past decade, Aspiration has worked with a range of partners and allies across the human rights sector on a wide spectrum of technology projects and events.

During that time, we have observed a recurring dynamic. Most human rights technology efforts—whether responding to an incident and mitigating a threat, working on technology features and usability, or doing evaluation and risk assessment—tend to focus on short-term horizons and/or be reactive in nature.

Read more about it (h2)

The venture was described as aiming to:

▸ Model potential future threats, adversaries and capabilities;

▸ Anticipate tool, process, and capacity needs NGOs and other human rights stakeholders will face; and ▸ Model how actions we take in the present and near-term may eventually have adverse or unanticipated consequences.

If you would like to share thoughts on the research or propose projects on which we could collaborate, please feel free to contact us at info@aspirationtech.org.
